In 1927, Woolf embarks on a two-and-a-half-year experiment with a loose-leaf diary, meant to catch more stray or "loose" thoughts. Her 1927 loose-leaf diary seems to plunge her into her creative unconscious. An off-handed air emerges from this diary, which seems a holding pond spontaneously spouting scenes. Orlando comes to her in this diary and the play-poem The Waves. The loose-leaf diary both invites unfettered fancy and serves as a site to preserve, and even restrain, Woolf's "gushing mind" as she enjoys the "ardour and lust of creation." Touchingly, at this time when Woolf is awash in spontaneous invention, she reads in August 1927 the first published version of Katherine Mansfield's Journal. She could hardly fail to note there Mansfield's greater struggle and self-doubt. Yet Woolf finds Mansfield's Journal most suggestive. Mansfield endorses androgyny there; she describes an imaginary child who changes gender. Journal passages also resonate uncannily with Woolf's own growing ideas for The Waves, and Mansfield offers the concept of "derision" which Woolf will take for Three Guineas. More than anything, however, Mansfield's 1927 Journal presents Woolf with ideas and a cautionary life story for A Room of One's Own.

A tricky question emerges from the Supreme Court's decision in Campbell: If a parodic work, to use Justice Souter's words, shades into satire, is it no longer classifiable (and therefore no longer defensible) as a parody? Should it be regarded as having crossed a critical boundary for fair use purposes? Campbell suggests that it should, but there are actually compelling reasons, rooted in principles underlying the doctrine of fair use, why some types of parodic works that shade into satire should not be regarded as infringing. After examining the curious development of the parody/satire distinction within the law of fair use, this article draws on literary theory to propose a workable and more accurate taxonomy than that provided in Campbell, by means of which courts engaging in a fair use analysis can evaluate works that are hybrids of parody and satire. Advances in Educational Technologies and Instructional Design, Innovative Instructional Design Methods and Tools for Improved Teaching. Towards an Objective and Fair Measurement of Performance. Objectiveize the Evaluation.

Evaluation is a dynamic, systematic, and methodical process which aims to make a value judgment on performance. It is presented in different forms meeting specific training objectives. Evaluating involves a complex task due to the cognitive, social, cultural, and psychological elements that it involves, and it is not always perceived favorably by neither the evaluators nor by those who are evaluated. The tyrannical omnipresence of grading creates a climate of stress which leads to counter-productivity among learners; school therefore takes on a truly anxiety-provoking character, which has been the subject of numerous debates. The work of Gisèle George in 2002 and the work of Peter Gumbel in 2010 underline that the grading which is observed by subjectivity is an instrument of “pedagogical torture.” According to Gérard Scallon, “evaluation is a reality which encompasses an infinity of operations, without this necessarily requiring the judgment of the people who evaluate. “
