

Stages of Evil

The Bundahišn. On the Stages of the Battle of Material Creation against the Evil Spirit. On the Stages of the Battle of Material Creation against the Evil Spirit.

This chapter describes the response of the good creations to the onslaught of evil. Particularly interesting are the myth describing the role of the star Sirius in ensuring rainfall and the horoscope of the first man, Gayomard, which provides an astrological explanation of his life and death.

This chapter shifts the focus from the players to the coaches. After the basketball scandal broke in January of 1951, colleges, with the aid of many writers, were quick to label the players' misdeeds "criminal" and to attribute them to players' lack of moral values and flawed characters. Yet the blame for the pervasive corruption in college athletics did not rest on the shoulders of the athletes alone. The chapter argues that the college coaches, administrations, and other such authorities were also in part responsible for the gambling issue, although unlike the players, they were largely able to escape the taint of scandal. Thus, this chapter argues that how basketball coaches made their choice to ignore game fixing reveals the essential role their passive complicity played in the size and shape of the scandals.

. What Evil Means to Us. FOUR. Suffering Evil, Doing Evil. Unmasking Administrative Evil. The Dynamics of Evil and Administrative Evil. Dead of Night. 'Something evil, monstrously evil'. 'Something evil, monstrously evil'.

This chapter focuses on the third story, 'Haunted Mirror', directed by Robert Hamer. The story belongs to socialite Joan Cortland (Googie Withers) who tells the group about her husband Peter (Ralph Michael) and his obsession with an antique mirror. Lurking in the dark grandeur of the other room in the mirror is an unseen entity from a bygone age, the spirit of the mirror's murderous former owner Francis Etherington, which preys on Peter's jealousies. The mirror as a supernatural threshold has become deeply synonymous with the horror genre, having travelled far and wide by way of Chinese and Greek mythology, Grimm's fairy tales, and the mind of Lewis Carroll. The chapter looks at the British post-war male gender crisis embodied by Peter Cortland and the comparative strength of character displayed by Joan.

. Unmasking Administrative Evil. The Dynamics of Evil and Administrative Evil. The Fiction of Evil. Skepticism about evil, part I: Mythologizing evil. The Fiction of Evil. Skepticism about evil, part II: Nietzsche's war on evil. Making Sense of Evil. Doing Evil. Facing Evil. Unchosen Evil. On Evil. On Evil. Taking Evil Seriously. Evil and Negativity. Hear (no) evil, see (no) evil, speak (no) evil: artistic representations of Argentina's "Dirty War". Naming Evil, Judging Evil. Evil and the Morality of Conviction. Making Sense of Evil. Telling Evil Stories. Evil in the Western Philosophical Tradition. Kant on Radical Evil. Kant on Radical Evil.

This chapter argues that with Kant's critical philosophy, the metaphysical and epistemological premises of the Christian tradition were severely criticised, which, in turn, led to a new conception of morality and evil based on the decision of autonomous, moral agents. Focusing on the late Religion within the Boundaries of Mere Reason reveals that Kant's alternative conception of radical evil refers to the choice of a moral maxim that turns away from the moral law. The chapter outlines the conceptual schema and problematic orientating Kant's analysis, namely his claim that the individual is constituted by an original natural disposition (Anlage) to the good and an innate propensity (Hang) to evil, before concluding by examining Kant's claim that overcoming 'evil' is possible, despite his recognition that its grounding in individual noumenal freedom means that it is not possible to explain how this is possible.

. Evil in the Western Philosophical Tradition. The Perpetrators of Evil. The Perpetrators of Evil.

This chapter outlines John Kekes's attempt to develop a perpetrator-based account of evil that holds that evil entails undeserved harms inflicted on others. This leads him to distinguish between different types and degrees of harm, as well as to develop what he calls a 'character-based' morality against the historically dominant 'choice-morality.' However, he also claims that evil is not simply caused by the actions of individuals but emanates from the conditions of life itself, including contingency, indifference, and destructiveness. Because these induce the harm that Kekes associates with evil, he concludes that evil is in-built into human existence. However, while there is no escaping all forms of evil, Kekes introduces the notion of moral desert to argue that the job of morality is to face evil and ensure that it is suffered only to the extent that it is deserved based on the actions and hence character of the individual. The implication being that some individuals deserve to suffer the evils that befall them whereas others suffer evil without deserving it. The conclusion identifies a number of problems inherent in Kekes's account.

In the context of an article published in 2005 on foreign readings on the evolution of social law, the distinguished French scholar Alain Supiot connects the elaboration of The Freedom Comes First to the European constitutional debate of the 2000s. Trentin's reflections on the inseparable link between work and knowledge in the third industrial revolution and on the centrality of the person for a political reform project based on the revival of the European social model and on the role of a federal Europe in the governance of globalization are adequately underlined. The transnational dimension of Bruno Trentin's political thought is confirmed in the field of labour law and in the debate on the European social model and the future of Europe . Artibus et Historiae. Artibus et Historiae. Scritti sull'arte.
